EDUCATION

| | |
|----------|--|
| 1988-92: | Queen’s University, Kingston, Ontario, Canada; PhD. PhD thesis: Black Island in a White Sea: Black and White in the Making of Alexandra Township, South Africa . Synopsis: Alexandra Township was founded in 1912, one year before the infamous Natives’ Land Act of 1913. The residents there had freehold property rights, yet the majority of residents were tenants of the property holders. The township became a testing ground for ideas of African urban self-government and a locus for urban entrepreneurialism in partnership with some liberal whites. Local services were provided by the Alexandra Health Committee which had elected African officials for many years. This is a unique examination of how an African urban community developed at a time of hardening segregation and issues of overcrowding. Unique findings include uncovering of the role of women in enforcing local boycotts, the development of health and educational provision for Africans in the city, the increased opposition to the settlement by wealthy white suburbanites nearby, public health provision, and the role of local entrepreneurs. Supervised by Professor Alan Jeeves; Professor Donald Harmon Akenson; Professor Robert Shenton. Internal Committee Members: Professor Robert Malcolmson; Professor Jonathan Crush. External examiner Professor Dunbar Moodie. |
| 1986-88: | University of South Carolina, Columbia, SC, USA; MA. Thesis: White South Africa?: The Role of Skilled White Miners in the Development of Labor Policy on the Witwatersrand, South Africa, 1890-1910 . Synopsis: Examines the comparative roles of Cornish and Australian miners on labor militancy on the South African gold mines either side of the South African War. The unique contribution to knowledge was this being the first examination of how the composition of the white working class in South Africa contributed to the actions of labor particularly after the War when the number of Australians working on the mines more than tripled as well as examining health issues among the miners. Supervisor: Professor Ronald Atkinson. |
